"Halloween in Retrospect"

Halloween began centuries ago as a religious observance. "All Hallows Even" designated the evening before All Saints Day, a time when tribute was paid to all those who died in the faith, i.e. as Christians. The present observance is far from Christian. It tends more toward a pagan festival of idolatry and superstition.

The symbols of Halloween reflect belief in the spirit world. Black cats, witches, devils, bats, pumpkins, etc., are not symbols of a dynamic faith in Christ and its expression in the world. They are remnants of pagan witchcraft and all too often leave their permanent imprint on young and pliable lives.

Pranks and vandalism are almost synonomous with Halloween. Many of the pranks are harmless but others are costly. The newspapers this year carried accounts of numerous deaths in connection with Halloween. No estimate has been made of the property damage which resulted from this abandonment of restraint. Fortunately we live in an area where the observance of Halloween is subdued.

The matter of disguises and masks at Halloween presents an interesting study. All the slops are pulled. The uglier the costume, the more complete the disguise, the better. One wonders whether the customs of Halloween do not depict the deepest yearnings of the human heart which the years of socialization have not eradicated but succeeded only in covering up. Is our true nature expressed in these once a year celebrations? "Trick or treating" is an interesting and apparently harmless custom. It is enjoyable to visit other homes in the neighborhood and to have visitors in one's own home to share in the festive spirit. However, as with many other customs, too often the sole purpose in going "trick or treating" is the amount of loot which can be gathered. Stripped of its respectability this custom could hardly be classified as other than begging, and when the threat is actual, falls little short of robbery.

Is this the side of our character which we really want to show to others? Are the practices surrounding Halloween what we want our children to imitate when they grow up? Do we betray our Master when we take part in such practices?

I do not stand back and criticize. I am involved. I participated in many of these practices this year, but as I look back I have found the disturbing questions as to whether my actions on Halloween honored my Saviour. Perhaps you have felt the same misgivings. We can't control American customs but we can determine our own actions! Perhaps we should give this matter some consideration.

Witness

Lesson for November 8, 1964

The best advertising is not in print. Manufacturers set aside enormous sums to full-page ads in newspapers or slick magazines, for posters and billboards, for spots on TV, and so forth; but what no company can buy is the best advertising of all—word of mouth. One person telling another; I've tried it, and it's great! It is the surest way of getting the truth — if it is truth — spread around among the population. You can pay to have lies printed; but you can't pay people to lie about your products; word - of - mouth advertising is generally truthful.

For Truth, Not Trifles

Christian life is more than talk. It begins with faith, and this is a matter of attitude, of response to God, not of words. The real test of a Christian is never first of all. What does he say? Nevertheless words are a part of the Christian life, and an important part too. Man is a word - using and word - making creature, and if Christianity were a silent wordless thing, it would be unfitted for the life and needs of men. The amount of words poured out in conversation every day is enormous, no one can count them; but how many of those are Christian words? This brings up another question: What kind of talk is Christian? For one thing, the Christian speaks up for truth, not lies — of course. Many hoods today, many speakers from public platforms, many editors, feed the public with lies or half truths. The Christian man will not ask first of all what is pleasant and popular, but what is true. A lying Christian is no Christian at all. But the truths for which Christians speak are the important ones.

For Those Who Have No Voice

A communist will tell you that all religions, including Christianity, are gigantic frauds; tranquilizers to make people forget their fears and troubles; and that only communism has any real interest in the people on the bottom levels of society, the poor, the depressed, around the earth. This is one of the communist lies. A great deal was said and done for the oppressed and voiceless of the world long before any communists were heard of. For example: In England, when machines were first used in industry, much of the work was done by little children, as young as seven years. Their working hours were from 5 a.m. to 8 p.m., standing all that time. In the mines it was even worse; little children five years old, boys and girls, had to drag tubs of ore out of the mines, through roadways often under 28 inches high—for a 16-hour day. Those workers were voiceless, they needed a voice to speak loudly for them; and it was Christian voices, especially that of Lort Shaftesbury, one of the great Christians of our century, who roused the conscience of England, and changed the laws. A "Christian" who is silent about injustice when he has a chance to speak, a "Christian" who is blind to injustice hardly deserves the name of Christian.

For Truth

A Christian's witness, then, is always for truth; always for justice; and also, first and last, for Christ. Speaking up for Christ seems often more difficult than speaking for truth and for the victims of injustice. Don't we often leave all the witnessing for Christ to the preacher? But the fact is, if we do that we are dodging what can be not only our duty but our delight. What does it mean, really, to "witness" to Christ?" It just means speaking up for Him. When you hear someone talking down a Christian truth, whenever you hear someone denying that Jesus was right, whenever you hear Jesus ridiculed as long out of date, or hear Christians caricatured as starry-eyed fools, then is the time to speak a good word for Him. Speaking out for Christ means letting people know you are a Christian.
